Title of Practice 1: Implementation of a Hybrid Teaching Model for Enhanced Teaching-Learning Ecosystem

Context: In response to the global pandemic, the institution has transitioned to a hybrid teaching model, blending offline and online modalities to optimize the teaching-learning process.

Practice: Faculty members have actively participated in professional development activities, including short-term courses and Faculty Development Programs (FDPs), to enhance their proficiency with online teaching tools and methodologies. Concurrently, new e-content resources are being developed to complement traditional instructional materials.

Evidence of Success: Significant progress in e-content resource development demonstrates the faculty's commitment to evolving pedagogical practices.

Challenges and Resource Requirements: Ensuring access to online courses for all students remains challenging, especially for those without smartphones or reliable internet connectivity. Additionally, centralized facilities for e-content development are essential for efficient resource creation

Evidence of Success: The program trained 24 new faculty members through online sessions featuring policymakers, administrators, technocrats, and professionals, employing innovative training methodologies, e-content development, and MOOCs.

Challenges: To ensure inclusivity and affordability, the program utilized open-source and trial proprietary software. However, financial constraints limit access to advanced proprietary tools, necessitating strategic resource allocation and alternative funding solutions.
